

Giants of Ancient North America

Thanks Greg ! Very interesting esp. some in Ohio too.

This is being circulated to interested parties. You've been added.

Jim Leslie

Hello there,

You may already have this on record however I feel compelled to share this with you.

I have just located a wealth of information about Giants of yore in North America....and around the world for that matter. Provided is the link:

<http://www.sydhav.no/giants/newspapers.htm>

Very old articles from the prestigious 'New York Times' newspaper were reporting giant skeleton bones unearthed as early as 1885. One article is of particular interest to me (about a Giant buried City in Missouri) and should go up on your website. See attached.

Another New York Times article states.... "bones [were found] of a frame that could not have been less than 12 feet in length [and] the forearm was 4 feet long [with a] well-preserved jaw the lower teeth...the largest [tooth a] walnut in size..." Feb. 11, 1902.

As your website points out, there seems to be an alternate North American history that has been hushed up. I believe this information is important to your cause.

Finally! We have found tangible information about the giant-race that once lived in North Americas' distant past.

Many Thanks

Regards:

Greg Jenner

Author of:

'Nibiru and the Lost Tribes of Israel Connection.'

'Planet X and the Kolbrin Bible Connection.'

Article attached ...missouriburied

<https://www.dispatch.com/content/stories/science/2013/12/22/1-ancient-ohio-cultures-were-devoted-to-sun-and-moon.html>

from Chris

New Details on the Ark

Jim, this is an interesting piece on the possible construction of Noah's Ark.

Buzz

<http://www.foxnews.com/science/2014/01/24/ancient-tablet-reveals-new-details-about-noah-ark-prototype/>

Old Blue-Eyes is Back!

Good one, thanks Buzz !!!

Jim, artists may need to re-think what early European hunter-gatherers looked like. Look at the cheek bones on the skull. Interesting thoughts about immune systems and early man.

Buzz

<http://www.theguardian.com/science/2014/jan/26/swarthy-blue-eyed-caveman-dna-tooth>

Easter Island's Statues Reveal Bodies Covered With Unknown Ancient Petroglyphs - MessageToEagle.com.htm

MessageToEagle.com - Standing some 2,000 miles west of Chile, on the Easter Island, 887 mysterious giant statues have intrigued scientists and the public for years. For a long time it was believed that the massive statues consisted of just the heads. However, in October 2011, when the Easter Island Statue Project began its Season V expedition, scientists could reveal remarkable photos showing that the bodies of the statues go far deeper underground than just about anyone had imagined. Project director Jo Anne Van Tilburg said: "Our EISP excavations recently exposed the torsos of two 7m tall statues.

The statues on Easter Island have bodies covered with ancient undeciphered petroglyphs. Image credit: EISP.ORG

A close-up of petroglyphs on the back of one of the statues. Image credit: EISP.ORG

"We found a round, deep post hole into which the Rapa Nui had inserted a tree trunk," she said. Van Tilburg said ropes were attached to the tree trunk and to the partially carved statue. "We found a rope guide that was actually carved into the bedrock near the statue." The Rapa Nui then used the tree trunk to raise the statue upright. Before the statue was upright, they carved its front. Once it stood erect, they finished the back, Van Tilburg explained.

The excavation team also found about 800 grams of natural red pigment — nearly two pounds — in the burial hole, along with a human burial. Van Tilburg believes the pigment was used to paint the statues, just as the Rapa Nui used pigment to paint their bodies for certain ceremonies.

The unusually large amount of pigment found indicates that it might have been used by a priest or chief, perhaps as part of mortuary practice, she said. Human bones were found throughout the dig, indicating that people buried their dead around the statues.

Hundreds, perhaps thousands, of visitors to the island have been astonished to see that, indeed, Easter Island statues have bodies!

More important, however, we discovered a great deal about the Rapa Nui techniques of ancient engineering."

Among their discoveries, the team discovered:

- · The dirt and detritus partially burying the statues was washed down from above and not deliberately placed there to bury, protect, or support the statues
- · The statues were erected in place and stand on stone pavements
- · Post holes were cut into bedrock to support upright tree trunks
- · Rope guides were cut into bedrock around the post holes
- · Posts, ropes, stones, and different types of stone tools were all used to carve and raise the statues upright

The two "heads" in the quarry where Van Tilburg's team dug are standing figures with torsos, truncated at the waist, that have become partially buried by eroded dirt and detritus over centuries.

Van Tilburg with two workers from her Rapa Nui team of diggers. Image credit: EISP.ORG

The team also discovered that ceremonies were certainly associated with the statues.

On the project website, Van Tilburg said: "We found large quantities of red, some of which may have been used to paint the statues.

Finally, and perhaps most poignantly, we found in the pavement under one statue a single stone carved with a crescent symbol said to represent a canoe, or vaka.

The backs of both statues are covered with petroglyphs, many of which are also vaka.

A direct connection between the vaka symbol and the identity of the artist or group owning the statue is strongly suggested."

Still, many of these ancient petroglyphs remain undeciphered and the history of one of the most remote islands in the world is now even more mysterious than ever.

Article link doesn't work – 37 attachments in file ...forwardmailingeasterisland